Francisco Romero's Ranch

The ruins of Francisco Romero's ranch are the youngest archaeological remains at Romero Ruin. The ranch may have been built before 1850. It was a lonely 12 miles from Tucson, and endured many Apache raids. Remnants of cobble walls from four or more structures are clearly visible today.

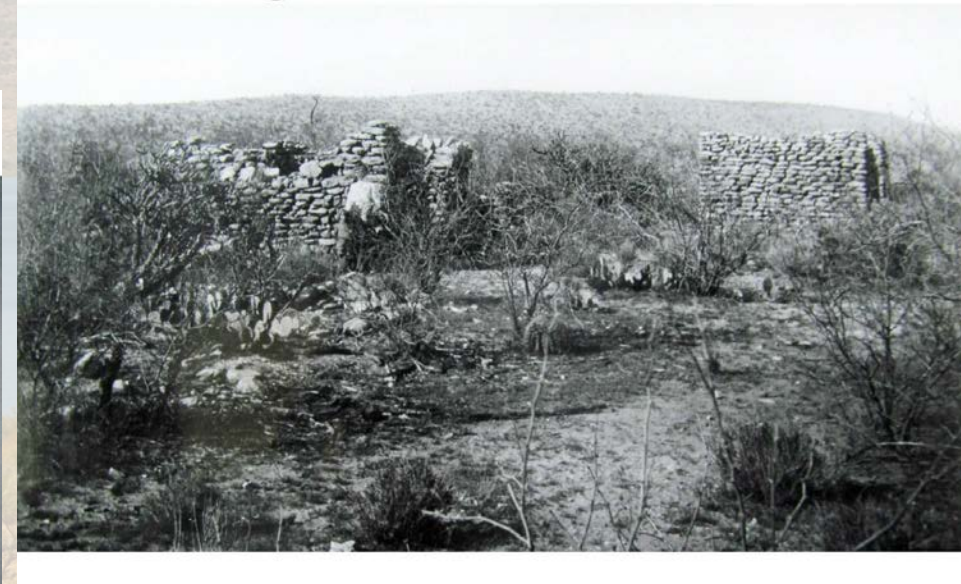

This photograph was taken from here in 1910. It shows walls that were seven or eight feet high, though the roofs of the buildings were already gone. The building on the left in the photo has been partially restored so that the walls are more easily seen. Note the doorway, visible in the photograph. Recent excavations revealed part of a fireplace in the far corner of this room.

The building on the right has not been restored. As the decades have passed since 1910, the feet of visitors and erosion by desert wind and rain have reduced the building to a pile of rubble that only hints at its earlier form.
